The usual WSax form pleȝian gave ME pleie(n, later plaie(n, play, the OE plaȝian in Anglian texts gave the northern plawe, plaw The γ forms in 2–3 pleoȝe, ploȝe, pleowe, pleuwe appear to mix the two.

The primary senses under each of the following branches were already in OE, and the order of their development is more or less inferential, but all the uses of 'play' are seen to arise naturally from a primary notion 'to exercise, bestir, or busily occupy oneself', the line of development having been here determined by the recreative or divertive purpose of the exercise. In the names 'play', the sense of exercise or busy occupation disappears and the word (sense 15) of PLAY sb 13) comes to mean 'to cease work, to be idle'. The same notion, developed in quite a different line, accounts for the continental senses of plegen, pflegen, 'to have care of take kindly charge of, cultivate and 'to be in the practice or habit of', notions which evidently imply occupying oneself busily about a thing or person, and habitually exercising oneself in an action.]

I To exercise oneself, act or move energetically, actuate, exercise (a craft, etc.).

†1 intr To exercise or occupy oneself, bestir one's self, be busily engaged; to act, operate, work Obs. exc with allusion to other senses.

†II 6 intr To be pleased, to like; to have the will or desire, to have the humour, to think proper. (In sense, exactly = the passive in 4, 4 b)

The history of this inverted use of please (observed first in Scottish writers) is obscure. But exactly the same change took place in the 14th c. in the case of the synonymous verb LIKE: where the impersonal 'it liked him him liked' became 'he liked c 1430 It may therefore be assumed that please was similarly developed from the impers n me pleases (c 1440 in 3 c) Cf also Malory s me ought; in alliterative Morte Arthure 'me aughte' with Wyclif's 'I awte, later 'I ought' The parallelism is the more in the case of please is that the sense was already logically ex pressed by the passive to be pleased (sense 4) and that the new idiom was therefore not needed he pleases being amply = 'it pleases him, and 'he is pleased' Shakspere uses the three forms indifferently Indeed, all the con structions of the vb. exc 6 c, are richly exemplified in his works see Schmidt

c. Please! (imperative or optative) was app originally short for please you (3 c) = 'may it (or let it) please you'; but it is now usually taken as = 'Be pleased' (imperative of 6), or as short for 'if you please' (6 b)

Thus use of please appears to have been unknown to Shakspere, whose shortest form is please you (3 c).

When parenthetical, or not referring to you, please is = may it please you, if it please you if so please, e g Please, may I go out? May I come in please? Come here please. Give me my hat please. Please, sir, may I speak? Shall I ring the bell? Yes, please Will you, please, take a message for me?

But when followed by an infinitive, it is = Be pleased e g Please to excuse my keeping you waiting, Please to return the book soon Please not to lose it

Plight (plait), sb[2] Forms a 4–5 plit, plyt, 5–6 plite, plyte, (5 plyte). β 4 5 plyzt, plyzt, 5–6 plyght, e. 5– plight [ME. plit, plyt, = Anglo F plit (or Law Lat. from Law French), for ONF. plest*, OF plost fold, act or manner of folding, also, manner of being, trim, condition, state (13th c. in Godef.) see PLAIT sb[1] (of which this is in origin a doublet). The β forms are taken over from PLIGHT sb[1], when that word was (in some parts of England, already in 14th c.) reduced to plit, plite, and thus identified in pronunciation and sometimes in spelling with this, this began in turn to be spelt plyght, plight, which superseded plit in 16th c. This spelling appears first in branch II, and perh there was association of sense, peril (PLIGHT sb[1] 1) being a kind of 'evil plight' (4 b below). In 16 17th c. the gh was often extended to the synonym PLAIT, written plyght, plaight (but for this there were also other possible models in eight, weight, straight, rimming with plait, wait.)]

1. Hist. The name used in the northern and eastern counties of England, after the Norman Conquest, for the unit of assessment of land, based upon the area capable of being tilled by one plough team of eight oxen in the year corresponding to the Hide of the south and south-west (with which it was often equated), and, like it, embracing originally the meadow and pasture-land, and other necessary appurtenances of the holding.

In Domesday Bk and other records in Latin, this unit is expressed by carrucata (=AF carue, ONF carwe, F charrée, Carucate) a derivative of carruca plough, while the hide is rendered hida It is not possible to say whether Plough-land was a translation of carrucata or the common verse: but we have no instance of the word before the end of the 13th c, and plo 56 itself appears first in the 12th The plough-land was the unit in which the carrucata was the unit of assessment are precisely those in which Danish influence prevailed, favours the theory that the plough land was of Norse origin The Hide and Carucate are difficult to define meant an acre, the normal area ploughed in one day The extent of the normal plough land like that of the hide, is usually given as 120 acres, but numerous instances it fell short of or exceeded this; the variations being probably due to attempts to make the areal plough lands correspond with the tradition assessment of the manors to the inclusion or exclusion of the appurtenances and fallow land, and to local differences in the size of the acre

The plough land was divided into 8 oxgangs as against the 4 yard lands or virgates of the hide

These words are thought by some to be derived from a popular L pilluccare*, inferred from It. pilucc-are to pluck (a fowl) OF pelucher (Marie de France, c 1190) ONF pelucher, pheluquer, mod Norm and Picard pluquer to pick, clean, peck, Walloon ploks to pick (grain), also with ex-, Romansch spluccar to pluck out, F éplucher to pick, sift; all from a popular L sb pilucca* tuft of hair, deriv. of pilus hair, widely represented in the Romanic languages: see PLUSH, PRUNE. (See Diez, Korting, & v pelucher, Kluge s v pflücken.)

It has been suggested that the late L or Romanc word was taken into Low German in connexion with the trade in down and feathers on the coasts of the North Sea; but in spite of the close similarity of form and sense, there are chronological, historical, and phonetic difficulties which are increased by the entire lack of evidence of the occurrence either the Teutonic or the Romanic word before the 10th c. Cf Franck s v plukken.

[Note In Dioscorides μολυβδαινα f μολυβδος lead, was applied to a mineral substance (v 97, 100), and a plant The former was yellow oxide of lead (PbO), esp the litharge produced in the extraction of gold and silver from ores containing lead By Pliny this is latinized as molybdæna, also once (xxxiv 18 50) by plumbāgo, which, as well as galæna, were applied by him to the yellow oxide, but prob included as an inferior variety the sulphide (PbS), called by Dioscorides μολυβδοειδης λιθος, 'lead like stone, the modern Galena For the plant Pliny always uses plumbago In the French transl (1572) of Matthiolus's Commentary on Dioscorides, μολυβδαινα or plumbago is rendered plombagine, in It plombaggine, and is stated to be identical with litharge, but other ores may have been included] hence the explanations of the word in Cotgrave and other English writers down to Bailey see Plumbagine, and sense 2 above. In Holland's Pliny, plumbago is rendered litharge In the 16th c, to Agricola and others in Germany practically interested in mining, plombago mainly meant the sulphide of lead but also included other substances similar to this in appearance, and in the property of staining the fingers and marking paper, esp. the native sulphides of antimony and molybdenum, Stibnite (Sb2S3) and Molybdenite (MoS2), and the mineral graphite In 1567 Christoph Entzel (Encelius) of Saalfeld while identifying Pliny's molybdæna, galæna, and plumbago distinguished the 'productive' species (i e. the oxide and sulphide of lead) from the 'barren (sterilis), which yielded no lead, and was mainly graphite: the latter was described by Ferrante Imperato in 1599 as employed in the grafio piombino, 'leaden pencil In 1779 Scheele found that certain samples of the 'barren plumbago on being burnt, were dissipated into carbonic acid gas and that in fact they consisted of carbon see quot 1786 in sense a. In 1789 Werner and Karsten proposed the name Graphite instead of the ambiguous 'plumbago' But its composition was still disputed An analysis, made by French chemists in 1786 had given, after volatilization a residue of iron, and plumbago was pronounced a carburet of iron (see quot 1795) This view prevailed until Karsten in 1826 and Sefström in 1829 proved that the iron was only an impurity in the specimens analysed and that graphite or plumbago was, as Scheele had said in 1779, really a mineral form of carbon (see paper by Dr John W Evans F L S in Trans Phil Soc 1902 I 181).

II In existing use

3 The art or work of the poet a With special reference to its form Composition in verse or metrical language, or in some equivalent patterned arrangement of language usually also with choice of elevated words and figurative uses, and option of a syntactical order, differing more or less from those of ordinary speech or prose writing

In this sense poetry in its simplest or lowest form has been identified with versification or verse of quota. 1658, 1756

This is its specific quality as a fine art. The idea of 'pattern' (in its tech nical use as applied to the arts as distinct from composition generally is that it is composition which has what is technically called a repeat and it is the repeat which tech nically differentiates poetry from non poetry both being (as arts) composition The repeat may be obv ous, as in the case of lines of equal length or it may be more implicit, to any degree of subtlety but if it does not exist there is technically no poetry The artistic power of the pattern designer is shown in the way he deals with the problem of 'repeat' and this is true of poetry likewise and is probably the key (so far as one exists) to any technical definition or discussion of the art

A ray of polarized light is reflected in different degrees in different positions of the reflecting body and transmitted by certain crystals in different degrees in different positions of the crystal and (in each case) completely quenched in one particular position This is accounted for by supposing the ethereal vibrations to be restricted to one plane (plane polarisation), instead being, as in ordinary light, performed in all directions perpendicular to that of the ray Light is also said to be circularly or elliptically polarised, or to undergo circular or elliptic polarisation, when it exhibits (in a polariscope) certain colour phenomena, or modifications of the phenomena of plane polarization, which are accounted for by supposing the ethereal particles to move in circles or ellipses Polarization is produced (variously in the case of different media) by reflection or by ordinary double refraction

F. poltron (also in 16th c. poultron), a knave, rascal; dastard, coward; sluggard, lazie backe, base idle fellow' (Cotgr.), ad. It. poltrone 'a poltron, an idle fellow, a base coward, a lazie, lither or sloth full sluggard, a lout' (Florio 1611), whence also med. L. poltro onem (S. Francis c 1220, Du Cange) Sp. poltron, Pg. poltrão, f. It. poltro 'sluggard, idle, lazie, slothfull' (Florio) + one: see OON. The 16th c. spelling may have been influenced by med.L. Originally stressed pu ltron, poltroo n (after Fr.) appears in 1664.

It. poltro adj. was app. from † poltro couch bed (Florio) cf. Milanese poltr Romagn. pultar resting place, Venet. poltrona couch, Pg. poltrona large arm-chair. It. † poltrare, poltrire beside poltronare, poltroneggiare 'to play the poltron, to loll and wallow in sloth and idlenesse to lye lazilie in bed as a sluggard (Florio). Poltro, poltrar are referred by Diez to OHG. polstar pillow bolster. The fantastic conjecture of the derivation of poltron from L. poltro francus, maimed or mutilated in the thumb (scil in order to shirk military service), was offered by Salmasius, and long passed current as an 'etymology'; it prob. gave rise in the 18th c. to the use in Falconry (sense 2).
